

Santa Monica Daily Press

State Secrets, Religious Discord, and Design Dreams

October 23, 2014
Sarah Spitz

WESTEDGE DESIGN FAIR

I dream of new kitchen but the chances of making this happen are pretty slim. At the WestEdge Design Fair last week, I lusted after the Jenn-Air kitchen installations, Bosch's prototype high-BTU mini-cooktop, La Cornue's French country style ranges, and home barista equipment with a high-tech edge operated by iPhone. That wood burning turquoise Caliber outdoor grill, with its cone shape and domed head would fit perfectly on my patio.

But I fell head over heels in love with, and dragged people over to see, the most inventive and versatile kitchen workspace design product ever, by an Oklahoma based company called The Galley.

Their 2-, 3-, 4-, 5-, 6- and 7-foot configurations provide the perfect way to maximize any size kitchen space. Use it for prepping, cooking, serving, entertaining and more. They include a double-tiered sink, faucet and drain space with sliding cutting boards, solid serving surfaces, fitted holders for colanders and other accessories, and attractive cabinet storage spaces. The price of $2000 to $7000 strikes me as uniquely reasonable in the high-end design setting.

A girl can dream, can't she? Visit <http://thegalleysink.com> and you'll dream too.